like telling students that being a jerk is OK, so long as your goal is to get a good score. I was being cavalier about the various “mathematics as art” problems. But in the comments, Jack has asked an excellent question: in regard to the traditional problem from the book of

Euclid (ie. if  $a$  and  $b$  are integers and the GCD of  $a$  and  $b$  is  $d$ , then what is the LCM of  $a$  and  $b$ ), the authors use the term “natural” to mean a number like 6, 120, or something else. But what is natural about it? This can be resolved if you ask: “What is natural about the LCM and

GCD?” I would go so far as to say that your answer to that question (or to what your sources say) will be illuminating in your understanding of it. A much more thoughtful comment is that of Steve Holden, who suggests that the problem was influenced by the necessity of making it easily accessible to a wide audience, and that the authors of the book may have intended to express it differently if they'd been the ones writing it. This is what the authors here are being cavalier about, I think, particularly the GC and LCM part, as they provide no context at all for the word “natural”. In a sense, the author is “commandeering” the mathematics community for her own purposes. She picks up on a phrase from Jack Strawson’s book titled “Logic and Philosophy” which is commonly used and advocated for: mathematics in practice. It’s not that she's wrong, or that Strawson is, but rather that I think we must be just a bit more discerning about how we use words like "natural." I'm not sure the author intended to be cavalier about anything, but if you read her book, it seems to be a book
