Allen cites a litany of examples of Trump's apparent disregard for Republicans' ideals as the party's nominees tout their strategies to deal with the president. A tweet of this nature posted by Trump on July 6, in which he uses the word "treasonous" to refer to people who do not support him in his fight with special counsel Robert Mueller, has become his favorite, and no one else wants to use it. And yet, when asked to explain Trump's language on civility (or its lack thereof), White House staffers insist that Trump's intent is to be presidential. "The president wants the American people to have a sense of fair play," spokeswoman Sarah Huckabee Sanders said. "I think he believes that there's been a lot of unfair treatment of this president." This explanation doesn't seem to provide much. If Trump had that intent, he would use the term "fake news," not "unfair treatment." Maybe he does, but it seems more like a smokescreen, a red herring. "President Trump has clearly over the last several months established himself as a bully who doesn't respect tradition, the Constitution, rule of law or anyone else who disagrees with him," Dan Pfeiffer, a former White House official, wrote in The Atlantic earlier this year. "He
