In late 1941, Richard von Mises began formulating his theory. In his first book on probability theory, published in 1944, he identified the main objective of mathematical statistics as being to predict future events. In his second book, Human Action, published in 1949, he also defined the "scientific" approach to economics. Both these books are now quite outdated, as such, they date from the time when economics was still a science and when collectivist political movements such as Stalinism were the order of the day. As such, the theory that is based on these two books is problematic. Economic historians have therefore downplayed the influence of both books. Of course, writing this paper has put me in contact with the "science" aspect of the theory of x -variance, and I realize that it goes right to the root of what I've been saying. Hence this new project will be much more open-ended in some ways, and not as structured as this last one. Reading the book, it looks very promising. My advisor was a fan of Karl Popper, and I've read many of his books on the history of science. Of course, those have all been original sources, as well. It's a very technical book. The x -variance was invented by a student of Popper's, and that chapter was written by Taneja (Theory and Applications of x -Variance and Regression, Springer, 1997). I haven't yet fully read the book, but it looks like it may prove interesting. Going back to my thesis, I was somewhat surprised that no one else had studied more than the first one. The version by Dagum, Hanse, and Soloviev is really a never-ending series of variations, and one would have expected that at least some of them would have been explored before. Good points. My scope is more than just the first book, though. Immediately following this I need to go back and read the papers in the second book. When I started at the math department I went to see one of the faculty members and asked him what to do. The department was half of a social science building with no part of the math department being separate from any of the others. I was told that I could take what classes were available to me. I chose a psychometrics course that was taught by the same department I was in. The faculty member I spoke to then told me that I could pursue anything I
